

Internet Possibilities for EC?

Researcher's Corner

by Bob Deller

The Internet offers several utilities relevant to marketing to the government, but an additional potential exists for electronic commerce.

The federal government has a mandate from the National Performance Review to conduct acquisition electronically. Although the General Services Administration expects to implement an "acquisition reform network" on the Internet, real business is expected to be accomplished through Electronic Data Interchange.

Agencies appear to be impatient with the EDI approach and are conducting early acquisition steps on the Internet (witness NASA's RFC for SEWP II recently released on the Internet). Other NASA sites, notably Marshall SFC, are conducting pilots of acquisition solicitation on the Internet. FAA is also following this path. This means no potential contractor should be without Internet World Wide Web access.

OMB's Office of Federal Procurement Policy is supporting these and other pilots in the use of Internet. OFPP is also part of the big Administrative push toward EDI. EDI and Internet are not synonymous, and there may be a collision between the two down the track unless integration can occur.

In general, security risks are still present on the Internet, in spite of a number of work-around products and firewall packages. Although anonymity can be established through many Internet products currently available, and user ID protection can thus be assured, accountability is reduced.

Downsides of the EDI option exist in costly operations, lack of a full suite of standards, and a disturbingly slow standards adoption process. The Internet is upgrading at lightning speed compared to the creeping EDI development process.

Benefits of EDI and Internet can be complementary. Today, the Internet can provide the frontend browser and EDI the backend business transaction process. Electronic storefronts and malls are uninviting just in themselves. Demand must first be created, and access needs to be encouraged. This may present a socio-cultural problem. Conservative participants call for minimum government involvement. They seek less regulation, support encryption and strict accountability. More progressive participants seek complete transactional privacy, without audits and traces. They support non-conventional economies and the creation of an artificial barter credit system in place of real cash. Other government issues such as taxation, law enforcement, and anti-terrorism require authentication of users, strict management of passwords (central key rather than public key), and accountability would fly in the face of public cries against invasion of privacy.

At this point, predicting Internet's role in electronic commerce is premature, but like most other programs, available technology will likely dictate the outcomes. The EDI process is simply too slow and costly.

INPUT Notes

Upcoming Breakfast

INPUT will be holding a breakfast at 8:30 A.M. on Thursday, July 27 at the Fairview Park Marriott in Falls Church, Virginia. The subject of the discussion will be Procurement Reform. Kevin Sabo of the Government Reform and Oversight Committee will be the guest speaker.

INPUT Open House

INPUT's Open House, held on May 11, was a great success. INPUT and its employees would like to thank all those who attended.

Wireless Study

INPUT is conducting a multi-client Federal Wireless Technology Market Study to provide a comprehensive analysis of the federal government wireless technology market, trends, opportunities, agency directions and overall technology requirements.

For more information, contact Barbara Flaherty at 703-847-6870.

Internet Access

INPUT's website on the Internet is at HTTP://www.input.com.

Federal Conference

INPUT's annual Federal Conference will be held on June 14-15, 1995, at the Fairview Park Marriott. The conference is entitled "Through the Looking Glass" and will both examine and open for discussion the realities of a reinvented government.
